Terminology Trivia

Binnacle List

Many novice Sailors, confusing the words "binnacle" and "barnacle," have wondered what their illnesses had to do with rusty growths found on the hull of a ship. Their confusion is understandable.

Binnacle is defined as the stand or housing for the ship's compass located on the bridge. The term binnacle list, in lieu of sick list, originated years ago when ships' corpsmen used to place a list of the sick on the binnacle each morning to inform the Captain about the crew's health. After long practice, it came to be called the Binnacle List.

Bamboozle

In today's Navy, when you intentionally deceive someone, usually as a joke, you are said to have bamboozled them. The word was used in the days of sail also, but the intent was not hilarity.

Bamboozle meant to deceive a passing vessel as to your ship's origin or nationality by flying an ensign other than your own -- a common practice of pirates.

Ultramodern Diesel Submarine To Be Tested In Russia

From Russia-ic.com, 21 Sep 06

Tests of the unique advanced submarine "Saint Petersburg" soon start in the Baltic sea. The ultramodern diesel submarine was designed for Russian Navy and doesn't have any analogues. The submarine is notable for its high combat capacities, fair speed and cruising range. "Saint Petersburg" is able to stay underwater without refueling for 45 days.

Moreover, the submarine has low noise level and is equipped with unique systems of environmental security. All mentioned systems would be tested in a naval cruise.

Submarine clean-up

By Jane Morgan, Dive Magazine (UK), 20 Sep 06

The Navy's first submarine has been revealed in all its glory after survey divers succeeded in cutting away lines and netting that had swathed the wreck. Divers from the Nautical Archaeological Society have been working with submarine historian and diver James McCartney to clear the wreck of the Holland V sub, which lies at 30-36m, six miles southeast of the Royal Sovereign Lighthouse, Eastbourne.

A protected wreck, it is believed to be the most intact example of the Holland series designed by John Philip Holland and regarded as the basis for all submarine design since its commissioning in 1903. The wreck is almost entirely intact and sits upright - it sank while under tow in 1912, possibly as a result of water flooding in through a torpedo hatch. McCartney is the wreck's current licensee, with a permit to survey and record the wreck and act as the government's representative in looking after the vessel.

Working with the Nautical Archaeological Society (NAS), McCartney has been able to allow groups of divers to visit the wreck on the Spartacat dive boat, including a recent party from Crawley BSAC. 'Historically, the Holland V is incredibly important,' McCartney told DIVE. 'It was the first submarine accepted into service by the Royal Navy, and brought together a balance of technologies that make it the basis of all submarine design since. John Philip Holland is pretty much the Oswald Wright of submarines.'

McCartney first visited the wreck in 2000, when it was unprotected, and is now tasked with monitoring its protection for English heritage. 'I've spent a good ten hours hacking away nets and the full glory of the 63ft [20m] long wreck can now be appreciated.'

To take part in survey work on the submarine, divers are encouraged to carry out two-day courses with the NAS, as there are plans for future 'public' dives on the Holland V. For more details email project manager Mark Beattie-Edwards on mark@nassportsmouth.org.uk or phone 023 9281 8419.

Navy contractor pleads guilty to sabotage

Associated Press (Daily Press), 20 Sep 06

NORFOLK, Va. -- A contractor pleaded guilty Wednesday to sabotaging Navy computers that track locations of submarines and ships because his company didn't win another government contract. Richard F. Sylvestre, 43, of Boylston, Mass., pleaded guilty in federal court to one count of damaging protected computers.

Sylvestre owns computer company Ares Systems International, which held a contract to provide computer maintenance for the Navy's European Planning and Operations Command Center in Naples, Italy.

Sylvestre told Navy criminal investigators that he programmed malicious software codes into computers at the European Command in May because he was upset that his company's bid on a project at the center was passed over, according to court records.

The sabotage could have caused Navy ships to collide with commercial vessels, but was caught after two computers crashed, the U.S. Attorney's Office said.

Sylvestre faces up to 10 years in prison and a $250,000 fine when he is sentenced January 18.
